HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR has been pleased to direct that the following extract from the "Bulletin of Miscellaneous Information" (Kew) for May and June, 1892, on the subject of the Vanilla Disease in the Seychelles, be published for general information.

By His Excellency's command,

Colonial Secretary's Office,
Colombo, October 1, 1892.

J. A. SWETTENHAM,
Acting Colonial Secretary.

Calospora Vanilla, Masee.

In the year 1887 an appeal was made to Kew for assistance and advice in regard to a disease that had attacked vanilla plants in the Seychelles. These islands as well as Réunion and Mauritius have taken up the cultivation of vanilla, and a not inconsiderable industry has been established there in recent years. The first information respecting the disease was contained in a letter written by Mr. J. J. Sharp, dated 10th May, 1887:— "I have referred previously to the Sans Souci estate in one of my letters to you, remarking upon the fine and healthy appearance of the vanilla vines and pods; but it appears Mr. Edwards finds hundreds of pods are damping off, and as is always the case, the plumpest and finest pods succumb first. These turn black at either end or in the centre, and in the course of a day or two drop off the vine. . . . Mr. Edwards said the disease was confined to a given area, and then he admitted it was a flat, damp piece of land without sufficient drainage. This is exactly what happened at the Cascade estate and under exactly the same conditions when they lost a very large quantity of pods."

The disease after this time appears to have become more general in estates in Mahé, and in order to protect the planters in their efforts to deal with it, a regulation was passed [No. 3 of 1887], "to prohibit the introduction of vanilla creepers" into the Seychelles from Mauritius and Réunion islands. At that time it was believed that the vanilla plants in the latter islands were also affected. This, however, does not appear to have been the case. In reply to applications made to Kew the following correspondence was addressed to the Colonial office.

ROYAL GARDENS, KEW, to COLONIAL OFFICE.

Royal Gardens, Kew,
October 27, 1887.

SIR,—I AM desired by Mr. Thiselton-Dyer to inform you that he has received from the Seychelles direct, as well as from the Director of Forests and Gardens at Mauritius, correspondence and specimens bearing upon a disease which has appeared amongst vanilla plants at the Seychelles.

2. Specimens of diseased vanilla pods were received here from Mr. E. H. Edwards, a planter at the Seychelles, with a letter dated the 10th May, 1887, and subsequently (31st May) we were addressed on the same subject by Messrs. Wright, Layman, and Umney, wholesale druggists in the City, who forwarded correspondence received by them from the Seychelles. Recently (September 10th) we received from the Director of Forests and Gardens at Mauritius specimens of vanilla obtained from the Seychelles with insects upon them. These latter were supposed to be in some way connected with the disease.

3. The vanilla cultivation is well known to be a staple industry of the Seychelles, and Mr. Thiselton-Dyer fully shares the opinion that anything affecting its permanence and welfare is a matter of deep importance to the inhabitants.

4. After a careful consideration of the circumstances as so far presented to him, Mr. Thiselton-Dyer is of the opinion that the cause of the disease is to be sought not in any insect or fungoid pest, but in the situation and nature of the soil and drainage.

Mr. Scott, the Assistant Director of the Gardens at Mauritius, appears to have arrived at the same conclusion. He states in a letter (received here 2nd May, 1887), "In my opinion there is no disease. The plants are only exhausted from overcropping, bad drainage, want of shade," &c.

5. The pods received from Mr. Edwards were so decomposed that it was impossible to trace anything upon them. The specimens of insects received on pods from the Director of Forests and Gardens at Mauritius proved to be mites (Acari), and in the opinion of an officer of the British Museum (Natural History), to whom they were submitted, "it does not seem probable that they are the cause of the disease."

6. The investigation of a disease of this kind can only be satisfactorily pursued on the spot and after observations have been continued during one complete season; but the information at present available points to questions of drainage and shade, which are matters well within reach of the cultivators themselves.

I have, &c.,
D. MORRIS.

The Hon. R. H. Meade, C.B.

ROYAL GARDENS, KEW, to COLONIAL OFFICE.

Royal Gardens, Kew,
November 23, 1887.

SIR,—WITH reference to my letter of the 27th October on the subject of the disease of vanilla pods at the Seychelles, I am desired by Mr. Thiselton-Dyer to forward the enclosed copy of a letter received from Mr. George Masee, to whom diseased vanilla pods received in May last were given for examination.

2. It appears after careful inquiry that Mr. Massee has detected in the pods a parasitic fungus belonging to the genus Peronospora; but before he can arrive at any practical conclusion it is necessary to obtain a supply of vanilla pods in different stages of growth for detailed examination.

3. Some of the pods might be sent in spirit whilst others might be sent in a small box, in a living state, attached to portions of the vine.

The Hon. R. H. Meade, C.B.

I have, &c.,
D. MORRIS.

Enclosure.

A fungus belonging to the Peronosporæ has been detected in the tissues of the vanilla pods received from the Seychelles. It is desirable that further material should be examined in order to ascertain the relation between fungus and disease. Specimens of pods, as rotten as possible (from the disease), even those of last season, if obtainable, should be placed in spirit, and other pods in the earliest stage of disease, showing a white mouldiness outside, sent alive.

G. MASSEE.

The specimens desired for investigation at Kew were received from His Honour T. Risely Griffith, C.M.C., the Administrator of the Seychelles, in February, 1890. They were submitted for examination to Mr. Massee, who has prepared the following exhaustive Report:—

In May, 1887, Mr. D. Morris, M.A., F.L.S., Assistant Director, Royal Gardens, Kew, submitted to me for examination some vanilla "pods" or fruits from the Seychelles supposed to be diseased. Owing to imperfect packing the material proved useless for investigation. In February, 1890, a second consignment was received representing every stage of the disease, which shows conclusively that the disease is caused by a microscopic fungus, Calospora vanillæ. Vanilla planifolia, Andr., is the species cultivated.

The first consignment consisted of "pods" or capsules only, and these, having been wrapped up while damp in lead paper, arrived in a half-decayed condition and completely covered with minute fungi such as Eurotium herbariorum, which had undoubtedly developed during the journey, thus rendering useless the material for investigation. A small species of Pythium was met with in fair abundance in the tissues; but this, as will be shown, had nothing to do with the disease that was causing the wholesale destruction of the vanilla plants.

The second lot of material arrived in excellent condition, and illustrated every stage of the disease from the earliest indication of its influence on the aerial roots to the dry and shrivelled leaves and stems, and included also a good supply of material in alcohol. The living stems had been cut into pieces about half a yard long, each piece bearing two or three leaves, and aerial roots often two yards or more in length. These pieces, over 30 in number, were packed between thick layers of blotting paper, and on being opened out were perfectly fresh and without a trace of mould, due probably to the moisture from the specimens having been absorbed by the superabundance of blotting-paper. The whole were packed in an air-tight box.

A preliminary examination of the material showed the presence of three apparently distinct species of fungi, distributed as follows:—

On some of the living leaves exceedingly minute subtremelloid pustules of a dull red or amber colour were present, springing in small groups from slightly discoloured patches. These were most abundant on the upper surface of the leaf, but in some instances occurred on both surfaces and are only just visible to the naked eye, rarely reaching 5 mm. in diameter. A microscopic examination showed that the pustules consisted of masses of gonidia belonging to a fungus agreeing with the characters of the genus Hainsea of Saccardo and Ellis. As to whether Hainsea is distinct from Glæosporium seems more than doubtful; this, however, is immaterial in connection with the present investigation, as the Hainsea will be shown to be simply a form species. Some of the leaves showed no external trace of the fungus; but mycelium was present in the tissues, and in some instances the Hainsea appeared at a later stage on leaves that were placed under a bell-jar and kept moist. Some time after the fungus has made its appearance on the leaves it also shows itself on the stem and aerial roots, which originate from the stem laterally too, and close by the insertion of the leaves; but it rarely extends for more than an inch from the insertion of the leaves, and its presence on these organs is due to the extension of mycelium from the leaves.

All the dying and dead leaves, along with those portions of the stem indicated above, were studded with the pale yellow waxy-looking, agglutinated masses of gonidio belonging to the form-genus Cytispora. The gonidia, when mature, exude through the ruptured epidermis of the leaf in the form of minute, elongated, viscid filaments, being held together by mucus derived from the gelification of the external portion of the walls of the gonidia. These filaments in drying assume various irregular masses, which persists on the surface of the leaf for a considerable time. These masses are arranged in more or less circular groups extending to 5 cm. in diameter; not unfrequently most of the viscid filaments forming a group become confluent while moist, and form an irregular waxy cake. The clusters are usually produced in such close proximity that the whole surface of the leaf is practically covered. The Cytispora is most frequently confined to the upper surface of the leaf, but not unfrequently both surfaces are covered. At a later stage, like the Hainsea, the Cytispora extends to the stem for a short distance from the insertion of the leaves. In old bleached leaves where the Cytispora spore-masses have been removed by rain, the surface presents a blackened appearance due to the numerous black pycnidia of the fungus which originate in clusters from a common mass of pseudoparenchyma, the stroma. At a later stage the central portion of the stroma of the Cytispora produces perithecia, enclosing spores contained in asci, which agree in all essential points with the genus Calospora. The mycelium of the Hainsea form occurs in greatest abundance in the tissues just below the epidermis, running between the cells and surrounding them with a mesh of hyphæ, but not piercing their walls. The hyphæ are of uniform thickness, measuring from 3-3.5  $\mu$  in diameter. At certain points where several hyphæ cross, lateral branches are given off which become closely entangled and eventually form a small, colourless cushion of pseudoparenchyma which destroys the epidermal cells lying immediately above, the cuticle at the same time bulging up. From the lower surface of the stroma numerous hyphæ extended into the leaf between the cells, completely destroying the tissues. From the upper surface of the stroma, that is, the surface lying nearest the cuticle, numerous slender cylindrical aseptate hyphæ grow up side by side; these are the gonidiophores, which, from their first appearance, are slightly clavate at the tips; these thickened apical portions continue to increase in size until they assume an elliptic-oblong form, and are then cut off from the gonidiophores by a transverse septum, and escape through the ruptured cuticle, forming the minute amber-coloured masses of gonidia involved in mucus already described. The gonidiophores are simple or branched, variable in length, extending to 25  $\mu$ , the average being about  $14-16 \times 3 \mu$ , the gonidia are constant in form and size, measuring  $9-10 \times 3.5-4 \mu$ , and, seen by transmitted light, are almost colourless. Sown in water these gonidia germinate within 12 hours, emitting a germ-tube from near one end, which soon produces short lateral branches at right angles; the whole perishes within two or three days, and in several cultivations the development never passed beyond the condition described above. When sown in a sterilised decoction of raisins and g-latine, the gonidia germinated as above, but the mycelium was much more vigorous in its growth, although not thicker, measuring  $3 \mu$  in diameter, sparsely septate, and becoming slightly thicker near its point of origin from the gonidium. In rare instances two germ-tubes are produced, one from each end of a gonidium, but in such cases one of the two remains in a rudimentary condition. On the third day after the commencement of germination small elliptical, colourless, secondary gonidia, measuring  $4 \times 2 \mu$ , are cut off from the tips of most of the branches.

These secondary gonidia, after becoming detached, reproduce themselves to an enormous extent by budding, but were never seen to emit germ-tubes. In flask cultures in a sterilised, clear solution of plums the gonidia within ten days give origin to a copious web of mycelium which produces microgonidia below the surface of the liquid; these reproduce themselves so rapidly by budding that the originally clear solution becomes turbid, and this continues until the nutritive material is exhausted, when the mass of yeast-like cells sink to the bottom like a precipitate. No further development could be obtained from the cells produced by budding although sown in various nutritive solutions, including the liquid from crushed living vanilla leaves obtained from the Royal Gardens, Kew.

A quantity of leaf-mould mixed with water was thoroughly sterilised by intermittent boiling in a flask until the water had evaporated, leaving the soil moist; into this was placed two drops of the decoction of plums containing the budding condition of the secondary gonidia; the flask was closed with sterilised cotton wool, and kept at a temperature of about  $70^{\circ}$  F. for six days, when a quantity of water recently boiled and proved by microscopic examination to be pure was added, and the whole thoroughly shaken up. On examination the water was found to be charged with budding forms of the secondary gonidia in all stages of development, but prolonged examination failed to show any other form of development. Some of the cells exceeded in size the measurements given above, reaching to  $6-7 \times 4-5 \mu$ , and not unfrequently formed little colonies of concatenate gonidia of various sizes organically attached. The contents of the flask were kept under observation for some weeks, but no other phase of development was observed.

The above experiment suggests that when the Hainsea gonidia are washed off the leaves by rain and carried to the ground, they germinate and produce yeast-like colonies of cells by budding, but what these cells eventually give origin to is unknown. Living vanilla leaves were infected with the Hainsea gonidia, but always without result, although tried in a variety of ways both on the upper and under surface of the leaf, and by being placed in wounded parts, from which it may be concluded that the Hainsea cannot reproduce itself directly on the living vanilla plant.

By the time the Hainsea is fully developed, owing to the ravages of its mycelium, the leaf has become yellow and is evidently dying, and at this stage the Cytispora (= Cytospora, Sacc.) begins to show itself in the form of very minute clusters of black points covered by the cuticle. A section of the leaf taken through one of these clusters shows that the points are black-walled pycnidia partly sunk in a common stroma. This stroma, which is convex on the side next the epidermis, is formed from mycelium indistinguishable from that of the Hainsea which preceded it in the leaf, and gives off from its under surface and margin numerous septate, branched hyphæ about  $4 \mu$  in diameter, the branches at once penetrate the cells of the leaf, where they usually form a coiled mass. The epidermal cells of the leaf have thick walls furnished with large pits, and it is through these pits, which are opposite to each other in contiguous cells, that the hyphæ pass from one cell to another, becoming very much attenuated in the pit and expanding again at once to the normal width on entering the cell. I did not succeed in observing the origin of the pycnidia from the substance of the stroma; but when fully formed, a vertical section through the stroma shows them to be circular in outline, with a slight prominence at the apex bordering a minute pore through which the gonidia escape at maturity. The pycnidia are frequently distorted from mutual pressure. The base of the pycnidium is buried in the substance of the stroma, and the whole structure has a thick wall of pseudoparenchymatous tissue composed of several layers of cells which appear in section, whether vertical or transverse, to be arranged in fairly regular concentric layers. The walls of the outermost layer are black or dark brown, and rather thick, and sharply define the pycnidium from the stroma in which it is to a great extent immersed. Proceeding inwards the walls become colourless, very thin, and the cells are filled with granular, vacuolated protoplasm; the innermost layer gives origin to the slender gonidiophores, which vary in length, and produce at their tips the elliptic-oblong, colourless gonidia, measuring  $14-16 \times 6-7 \mu$ . The gonidia at first have an external thin, hyaline, mucilaginous layer. The cuticle is ruptured by the upward development of the stroma, and the gonidia ooze out of the pycnidia in the form of mucilaginous tendrils, which forms the pale yellow waxy masses on the surface leaf, as already described. The clusters of pycnidia are small at first; but the stroma continues to grow and increase its area for some time, at the same time producing pycnidia from the newer peripheral portion; there is no tendency towards a concentric arrangement of the pycnidia. Cytispora gonidia sown in water produced within two days one or two germ-tubes, which develop into much-branched septate hyphæ, the cells nearest the gonidium becoming swollen into a broadly elliptical or globose form and presenting a moniliform appearance, due to being constricted at the septa; no further development took place, and at length the mycelium died. In a nutritive solution development commences as above; but after a copious formation of mycelium stromata are formed as follows. At certain points, where several hyphæ intersect, numerous transverse septa appear, cutting the hyphæ into short cells; these cells give origin to lateral branches, which, after growing erect in a fasciculate manner for some distance, become irregularly branched, the branches becoming interwoven and forming a compact mass more or less spherical in form, the whole stroma resembling a sphere supported on a short, thin stalk that originates from the mycelium. At first the stroma has a well-defined outline; but eventually the external cells of the basal half nearest the stem-like base grow outwards as blunt papillæ; these elongate directly into septate, branched hyphæ, which radiate from the stroma on every side and pass directly into the nutritive solution for the purpose of supplying the developing stroma with nutrient material. In slide cultures these stromata attain a diameter of 2 mm. in about three weeks, and are quite colourless. One promising example was watched from day to day for the appearance of black points which it was supposed would indicate the formation of pycnidia; but in this I was disappointed, and in place of black points a mass of gonidia was seen covering the stroma. The gonidia agreed exactly with those of the normal Cytispora produced on the leaves. The stroma, after remaining for some time in alcohol, was examined; a vertical section showed the presence of two pycnidia similar in shape to those already described, but differed in the almost total absence of colour from the outer cells of the wall, and in the fewer number of concentric layers composing it, only three being present. The umbonate apex did not project above the level of the stroma.

The spores germinated in a nutritive solution in a manner exactly similar to those obtained from the leaves, and there seems to be but little room for doubt but that the differences observed between the normal development and the slide cultures were caused by the different conditions under which the two were respectively developed. Living uninjured vanilla leaves infected with Cytispora gonidia yielded no results: the gonidia germinated on the moist epidermis, but the germ tubes appear not to be able to pierce the epidermis; or to enter through the stomata; on the other hand, when the gonidia were placed on a portion of a leaf from which the epidermis had been removed, germination took place, and the mycelium spread in the tissues, followed by the production of pycnidia in small numbers and imperfectly developed, whereas when the gonidia are placed on a dying leaf, where disintegration of the tissues has commenced, pycnidia are produced in abundance. The above experiments show that the Cytispora is a true saprophyte, and will not reproduce itself on uninjured living vanilla leaves.

By the time the Cytispora has completed its development the whole of the sap and protoplasm has disappeared from the leaf, which is consequently dry and shrivelled, and so long as it remains in this condition no further fungal development takes place, but if the leaf is kept damp the Cytispora stromata produce perithecia from the central portion, which originate as follows. A vertical section through the central portion of the stroma shows a minute spherical web of intricately interwoven hyphæ, filled with granular protoplasm and completely surrounded by a layer of slender, thin-walled, yellowish hyphæ somewhat concentrically arranged; the central web appeared to be perfectly homogenous, and showed no trace of an ascogonium or "Woronin's hypha," but the difficulty of obtaining a median section and at the right time may possibly account for the absence of any differentiation in the central web. For some time the entire body retains its spherical form, but continues to increase in size, due mostly to the increase in thickness of the bounding wall, but also to some extent to the growth of the central web; eventually the apical portion of the outer wall, or that portion nearest to the free surface of the stroma, grows upwards in the form of a cone until it bursts through the stroma. At this stage the young perithecium is conical in outline with a rounded base, the basal portion enclosing the spherical web of hyphæ, the bounding wall being 6-8 cells in thickness, pseudoparenchymatous below, but in the upper portion the hyphæ run in parallel rows. The two or three outer layers of the wall all round are at this stage differentiated by the dark colour and greater thickness of their walls, the walls of the inner layers being colourless, very thin, and containing granular protoplasm; the apical portion of the perithecium, consisting of parallel hyphæ, continues to elongate and becomes slightly curved, forming the neck, and on the portion above the stroma some of the peripheral hyphæ become free from the wall and form hairs. Contemporaneous with the development of the neck of the perithecium, the cells of the inner rows of the basal portion of its wall commence to elongate in the form of blunt papillæ, which grow into the central web of hyphæ, causing its complete disintegration, leaving a cavity into which the papillæ or young asci and paraphyses extend. Whatever the central web of coiled hyphæ may be, the homologue of its behaviour in the present instance suggests its function to be that of forming the cavity of the perithecium, serving as a nucleus round which the wall forms, and eventually disappearing when the asci develop, these latter soon completely filling the ready-made cavity. The origin of the neck-canal was not determined, but it certainly takes place at a later period than the basal cavity. The asci when mature are cylindrico-clavate and attenuated below into a slender elongated base. They measure 90-100 × 12-14  $\mu$ . The spores are eight in number in an ascus, biseriata, sub-cylindrical with rounded ends, slightly curved, colourless, and triseptate at maturity, and measure 15-16 × 5  $\mu$ . Paraphyses scanty, linear, equal, aseptate, 80-100 × 2  $\mu$ .

The ascospores germinate in water within 12 hours, producing one or more germ tubes which elongate by apical growth, become septate and produce a few lateral branches; no further development was observed, the mycelium dying for want of nourishment. In a nutritive solution the spores germinate as described, but growth is much more vigorous, and in about three weeks very minute pustules were formed by panicles of short, erect hyphæ, from the tips of which gonidia were cut off, resembling in form and size those produced by the Hainsea form on living leaves. In the cultures, the stroma was rudimentary or entirely absent, but the gonidia germinated in a decoction of plums in a manner exactly similar to those obtained from the leaves, and also repeated themselves by budding, and there seems no room for doubt but that the gonidial form of reproduction produced by the germinating spores of the Calospora agree with Hainsea found on living vanilla leaves. The accuracy of the above statement was verified, by the appearance of the Hainsea on living vanilla leaves obtained from the Royal Gardens about three weeks after being infected with Calospora spores. The leaf that produced the Hainsea was placed under a bell-jar with its base in water; another infected leaf suspended from the top of the same bell-jar yielded no result: from this it appears that the presence of an excess of moisture in the leaf favours the development of the fungus. The ascospores were placed on the uninjured upper surface of the leaves. The germ tubes of the Calospora enter the tissues of the leaf through the stomata, and the leaf is the only portion of the plant through which the parasite can gain access to the interior, as the stem and aerial roots are protected by a very thick, continuous cuticle; the growing points of the descending aerial roots are certainly tender and imperfectly protected, but I have not met with a plant attacked at these points. The production of the Hainsea from the Calospora closes the life-history of the fungus under consideration, although the proof from artificial cultures is not a complete sequence; for instance, the Hainsea stage could not be made to give origin to the Cytispora form, nevertheless the cycle has been completely proved as follows: the perithecia of the Calospora has been shown to originate from the stroma of the Cytispora, and the Hainsea has been produced from the germinating spores of Calospora.

SUMMARY.

The above account shows that healthy vanilla plants can be killed by a microscopic fungus, which may be called Calospora vanillæ in the following manner.

The earliest form of the pleomorphic fungus, the Hainsea form, attacks the living leaves, and by means of its spreading mycelium destroys their tissues, thereby causing the death of the plant by destroying those organs on which the plant depends for an indispensable portion of its food, as also for the regulation of the amount of water contained therein. The death of the individual plant is caused entirely by the Hainsea form of the fungus, as the Cytispora and Calospora forms only appear when the leaf is already killed. The statement that the tips of the "pods" or capsules and of the aerial roots first show symptoms of disease, although not scientifically correct, is quite in harmony with the above statements, for although the leaves are first attacked, and consequently first diseased, yet the mycelium of the fungus remains in the tissues for some weeks before it bursts through the cuticle to liberate its gonidia or reproductive organs, but during the interval between the first entrance of the fungus into the leaf and its reappearance on the surface in the mature condition, its mycelium has disorganised the tissues, thereby preventing the performance of those functions already stated, and consequently rapidly growing portions of the plant as young fruits and aerial roots, first show symptoms of disease at the tips on account of their being farthest from the source of food supply, and would probably show external signs of disease even before the leaves themselves.

PREVENTIVE MEASURES.

It is impossible to suggest remedies for the probable various causes of the vanilla disease without a thorough investigation of all the circumstances conducted on the spot; yet assuming that the most important factor in causing the disease is the fungus already described, it would appear that ordinary precautions on the part of the cultivator, by taking advantage of the weak point in the sequence of development of the parasite, would soon result in its total disappearance. It must be remembered that the Hainsea form which appears on the living leaves and does all the mischief cannot reproduce itself directly on other living leaves, but is followed at a later stage on the dying leaves; that is, the Hainsea mycelium produces another kind of fruit on the dying leaves, the Cytispora form, which possesses the power of reproducing its own form for probably several generations on dying leaves; eventually, when the leaf is quite dead, the masses of mycelium or stromata that produced Cytispora gonidia now give origin to the third or Calospora form, and when it is remembered that the Calospora spores produced only on dead leaves—can alone reproduce the Hainsea form on living leaves, it follows that if all fading and dead leaves are destroyed by burning, the fungus pest would soon disappear, or be at least so reduced as to produce no appreciable damage. Judging from the abundant supply of dead leaves literally teeming with the Cytispora and Calospora forms of the fungus that were forwarded with the material for investigation, it may be presumed that large quantities of leaves in a similar condition are lying about in the vanilla plots. If such is the case they should at once be burnt, as I venture once more on repeating the statement that the continuance of the disease depends entirely on the presence of such diseased dead leaves. The fact that the appearance of the disease in the Seychelles islands is of recent date suggests the idea that impaired vitality of the vanilla plants may favour the spread of the disease. It is not known whether vigorous growing vanilla plants can be infected; it is almost certain that weakly specimens would be more susceptible. Direct proof of this could only be obtained on the spot, but the statement accompanying the material, that the disease was most prevalent in flat damp places where the drainage was insufficient, favours this idea. The development of the Calospora condition on the dead leaves depends entirely on moisture; if the leaves remain dry no growth takes place, but the mycelium or stromata remain quiescent, and judging from analogy can remain in this condition for a considerable length of time, and on being moistened resume their activity. In like manner it is probable that the mycelium of the Hainsea stage in the living tissues may under certain conditions remain for a considerable time in the leaves and stem without showing itself externally; hence it would be highly imprudent to use even apparently healthy plants obtained from infected areas for stocking new estates.

In conclusion, it may be stated that the above-described vanilla disease is not confined to Mauritius, the Seychelles, and Réunion islands; specimens of Vanilla planifolia were received at Kew in 1886 from Antigua, New Granada, showing all three forms of the fungus; the Hainsea, not known at that time to be a form-species, was described as Glaosporium vanillæ, Oke. and Mass., in Grevillea, vol. 15, p. 18.

Since the above was written all the stages of the above-described disease have been followed on cultivated orchids at Kew, belonging to the genera Oncidium and Dendrobium.
